

Dearest Siggy,

I have entrusted this letter to the captain of the Dolphin, and hope that it will find you at Minrothad or elsewhere. It has been so long since we have seen you in Athenos, and young Sigurd can hardly remember you. All is well with us, although things are getting tight and I worry that we will run out of money soon. I hope that we will see you soon.

Your dearest Juliette

Sigurd,

Your affairs here in Minrothad are thriving well, as is your family. I have sold the last consignment of goods which you brought, and I have been looking for a good source of cheap weapons as per your last instructions. I think I may have found some as well - Captain Harker says that he has a contact in Thyatis in a garrison where the garrison is much understrength, and he is willing to sell a large part of the arsenal at very reasonable rates.

Your loving and faithful wife

Adrianna

Ziggi,

May all the blessings of Helim and his saints be upon you. Your family is well, and even my father sends you his blessings. I am sorry that you were unable to tarry near Dmitrov, but I am glad that you were at least able to send a sailor with your message, even if you were unable to come yourself. But I understand how busy and important you are in the navy, as do Ivana and Petrov. They look forward to the day when your duties allow you to settle down with us and see more of us. Until then I am your ever loving
Ludmilla
